Curator’s Statement

Manifesto

As our future races towards us at an ever-increasing rate, a head on collision with our present is in sight. And the only past worth considering is that summoned from the reservoir of intuition, feelings and experiences we carry within.

A Dialogue

Architects Drawings Models is a modest step toward acknowledging the fundamental challenge of our times: synthesis.

Civilization can no longer afford to labor under 19th century concepts. It’s time to put into practice the ideas and discoveries of visionaries like Einstein, Walter Russell, Malevich and other people, who in the early decades of this century, foreshadowed the approach to life, the collective we must grasp as the next stage of events unfolds.

Following their cue, this exhibition revolves around the concepts of wholeness, vision, cross-pollination, and poetic imaginings about the use of, approach to, and feelings about space.

The word ‘architects’ as used here refers to those formally recognized as such, and artists whose work touches upon similar, and in some cases, more expanded ideas concerning the articulation of space.

The later can be said to represent a vernacular approach, a way that issues from intuitive responses, as opposed to mere problem solving exercises about the nature of our spaces.

Summation

What this exhibition seeks is not a common ground. Creativity is not about democracy. It’s about passionate recognition of the paradigm belonging to the creative situation. When we create, we assume the powers of the Demiurge, Goddess, or whatever image conjures up so-called suprahuman direction.

Postscript

In preparing this show I was struck by how few female architects there are. This should be puzzling to all of us since our first experience of architecture on this plane is our mother’s womb. I hope that many more women will begin contributing to the dialogue on space, especially with regard to the mysterious play of resonance and nurturing.

There are two ideas about why people make art: to communicate or as a sort of spiritual exercise. (John Cage's: "to prepare the mind for divine influences"). I am much closer to Cage's idea but essentially all the notions are true. The motivation comes from a deep desire to communicate, and for some artists, to communicate on a quite massive level-something I have never really been interested in. I see no qualitative difference in more people versus one person if I am communicating. But the primary motivation for all art, I believe, is to communicate yourself to yourself-which IS a spiritual idea. Every person's life is about communication, is filled with communication. When we lose that ability we become mentally ill.
